AI-related stocks, particularly chip-maker Nvidia, had slumped earlier in the week after China's DeepSeek unveiled an artificial intelligence model to rival those of US tech giants.

But markets have clawed back most of those losses thanks to positive earnings and company strategy updates, and as some investors reevaluated the risks US firms face from Chinese competition.

"Monday's sell-off was likely an overreaction, as markets tend to 'shoot first and ask questions later'," said
